The present invention relates generally to a vehicle rims assembly and more particularly to a hub that supports a wheel during tire inflation pressure changes. The use of air pressure in a pneumatic wheel system is well known. The main air chambers in a pneumatic wheel system create a low pressure system to hold or suck a tire against the rim. Typically, when the wheel hits the ground the tire will "give" some, but not all of the air or vacuum in the pneumatic system will dissipate. This vacuum is created by the difference in air pressure between the wheel and the air outside. If the wheel loses all of the air pressure, the tire will not hold up against the rim. Additionally, the tire will collapse and the wheel will leak. A vacuum condition in the wheel pneumatic system, created by tire inflation pressure change, is also common, especially during turning and cornering. Hub covers are well known in the prior art. Hub covers are used to enclose the air intake of the wheel hub and work in conjunction with a valve stem to provide a constant air supply to a wheel for inflation. Hub covers are well suited to enclose the hub from external forces, but are not well suited to provide a positive pressure path into and out of the wheel. Thus, air from a constant air supply must be pumped into the wheel by an operator when not powered by the vehicle battery. Prior art FIG. 1 is a prior art illustration of a wheel 10 with a conventional hub and rim assembly. There is a wheel rim 12 with a plurality of spokes 14 that are connected to a hub 16 that has a central opening 18. An air intake valve stem 20 is located near the top of the wheel. An air exhaust valve stem 22 is located near the bottom of the wheel. While the air intake valve stem 20 and the air exhaust valve stem 22 are often located near the wheel center, they may also be located at or near one 3e33713323
